This investigation was precipitated by a report that narcotic addicts were alleged to visit Dr. Weinstein.

It was found on the investigation that Dr. Weinstein did not have records of dispensation. He had a large amount of narcotic drugs on hand, which did not appear in his inventory of June 13th, 1960 and he had made no purchases since that time. Dr. Weinstein was unable to account for this discrepancy. He said that the morphine sulfate tablets were purchased when he had the Weinstein Clinic in Fairmont seven to eight years ago and that when he discontinued the clinic he had kept all of the narcotic drugs for office use and had purchased only a few narcotics during the past few years, chiefly demerol.

Upon receipt of this report Dr. Weinstein was requested to appear before the Board. He appeared (See file for interview) and stated that he had kept the drugs when he closed the Fairmont Clinic; that he used very little drugs; that he did not sell narcotic drugs; that he did not personally use narcotic drugs. He admitted having written prescriptions for two women who claimed to have kidney colic. He said he dispensed drugs and wrote prescriptions.
